

THE AMADORIAN

A Publication of the Amador County Historical Society

President's Corner

Dear Fellow ACHS Member:

It is a privilege and honor to have been elected to serve as President of the Amador County Historical Society. I have had the benefit of serving on the board since 2013 under the tremendous leadership of Phil Giurlani and most recently, Keith Sweet. Both have led several successes for this organization and I hope to continue that momentum.

A few words about me. I was born and raised in Jackson under the roof of Mary and Gene Cova on Bright Ave. with my brother Marshall. We were raised with the mind of community involvement and knowing your roots. I can't think of another organization that fits that description better and I am proud to be part of the ACHS.

They say that a picture tells a 1,000 stories. Please be sure to take a look at the picture collage included in this edition of the Amadorian. You'll get a glimpse of the many wonderful projects and activities that this organization, through efforts of its volunteers, have been up to in 2016.

Lastly, please mark your calendar for Saturday, March 25th; our first event in 2017. We will partner with the Native Sons of the Golden West at their hall in Sutter Creek for lunch and program. Weather permitting, we will have a tour of the newly constructed Miner's Bend memorial.

I look forward to seeing you then!

Best regards, Jeana Hultquist President

Is the Ledger Really Older?

Editor's note: With the recent change in our local newspaper, I thought appropriate to look back at Historian Larry Cenotto's perspective from 2001 ~ Enjoy!

It's been years since the writer looked into the history (from 1854) of Amador newspapers or even earlier since our first paper saw print when this was Calaveras. With heavy news coverage of both counties in today's Ledger-Dispatch, it seems, journalistically, the two counties are becoming one again.

Perhaps new editor Andy Bird - let's wish him well - and other newcomers to the area should know some of the long history of this now twice-weekly sheet, the Ledger-Dispatch. Also, I'm proposing that the paper could be considered two years older than I and others have led you to believe.

Take the Ledger, older of its two names. No question the first issue of the Volcano Ledger hit that burg's dusty or muddy lanes October 27, 1855, out of the Eagle building. Years ago, when I started questioning the age of the Dispatch, the late and venerated Ledger editor, Babe Garbarini, warned me not to mess with the Ledger. I never had to.

In those halcyon days, Volcano was our most popular town. It came awfully close to winning the county seat in the July 17, 1854 first county election, and even closer three years later in the stage legislature. After that, almost spent, Volcano began that long decline to its present contentment as quaint village and curiosity.

In 1857, however, the Ledger moved to Jackson, county seat, and never looked back. Its name changed to Weekly Ledger. Perhaps proprietors Thomas Springer and Edward C Dangerfield couldn't bear to include the word "Jackson" in their masthead. Soon, though, they opted for Amador Ledger, which name it proudly carried until the grand merger in 1989, forming the present paper and name.

The Dispatch, in the mean time, for nigh a century carried on its masthead that it was born in 1858. It wasn't. It was whelped in Lancha Plana - that used-to-be-place on the right bank of the Mokelumne river, where Comanche reservoir laps now - in March, 1860, and moved to Jackson later that year. It, too, chose the epithet Amador rather than Jackson, and was the Amador Dispatch until the '89 merger.

Did both papers publish continuously all those years, 134 for the Ledger and 129 for the Dispatch? Not exactly. Had not man-caused calamity and the civil war interfered. I'm sure they would have. The great Jackson fire of August 23, 1862, destroyed Tom Springer's whole plant. Undaunted, he raced by stage and ferry to San Francisco, bought new type, and press, and had the paper out soon after.

So did the Dispatch, under new owners. But that paper suffered an even longer and more ignominious closure in 1865 when editor William Pentry exulted in print upon the news of Abraham Lincoln's death.

The Mississippian was a rabid believer in and supporter of the South. So, the federal army command in San Francisco ordered a cavalry company to visit Jackson before dawn one morning. Perry and his fiery editorial writer

Long Primer Hall were arrested, marched in scorching heat to Ione valley, and taken to Alcatraz to pound big rocks into smaller ones.

Over time, some papers buy out or absorb other papers, often memorializing the merger by including the purchased paper's name. To my knowledge, the Dispatch never took over another paper but the Ledger did twice. That's why some may decide, after reading the facts, that the Ledger part of this paper and hence this whole paper can claim to be older than the sacrosanct "October 27, 1855."

Circa 1921 the Ledger acquired the Amador Record of Sutter Creek. I'm sure many old-timers remember the paper's name became "Amador Ledger and Record." But the first newspaper the Amador Ledger acquired was actually older than it was, creating the opportunity to incorporate its founding date as its own. Many institutions do it. Sutter-Amador hospital use the Amador county hospital's date in ads even though its ownership was barely started. It seems okay.

Regardless, when Springer and Dangerfield came over from Coloma and Placerville in 1855 to start the Ledger the county already had a paper being published in Jackson called the Amador Sentinel. Papers in those days seemed to be started for political rather than economic or journalistic reasons. The Sentinel was no exception, and when you ponder it, the Ledger itself might have been started to promote Volcano's push for county seat through the Legislature.

We're almost certain the Jackson Sentinel was started by the immortal Charly Boynton and others in December, 1853, to make one final legislative push to separate this part of Calaveras from the that part south of the Mokelumne.

Amador Central RailRoad by Grant Vogal

Well fellow rail owners. Another year has almost come and gone and much has been accomplished on the Amador Central. It was decided to offer short public runs from 104 to Sunny Brook and return in order to establish a more reliable form of on going income as we always have bills to pay in addition to maintenance. Insurance, PGE, and weed spray are the three that come on a regular basis and our team is trying to regain our self sufficiency. Income from Rail Fair has been declining and last year the rent of school facilities tripled which has put this years Rail Fair in jeopardy but all keep plugging on to preserve our piece of county history. All of the FRA's inspection reports have been cleared, much brush has been cut away as have a few fallen trees. We still have brush to remove and hope the CCC comes through. Most of the water has been diverted around the weir in lone and the balance of work will be done by Spring. A road crossing on the top end needs to be improved for safer passage of rail cars and autos. I do not like to start a year end report with negativity but we do own a railroad and all is not always peaches and creme.

On the good side several excursions were held this year safely and we have had good participation by both owner groups. A special thanks go to Leonard Williams and son Jerry, Gary Reinhoel, Pam Sharp, and Thornton Consuelo, all ACHS members, who when they are able, contribute time and energy to our cause. Much work has been done to improve rail and right of way safety as well as grade crossing safety. We are also trying to sell off some of the duplicate signals from old crossings the state removed while retaining some for spare parts. We have received and put into service some ties.....just think, we only have about 50,000 to go. The search continues for grants to do some of the more costly work.

I never realized that my comment several years ago of "hey, the AMC might be able to be leased as it is being shut down by SPI" would lead to two groups owning 10 miles of this jewel in our backyard. We should all feel very fortunate to have the railroad in our hands and knowing that it will not be scraped or sold off. If you have ever ridden our line you know the scenic beauty it goes through as well as the history it still encapsulates. Yes, it takes work and money to keep it in operating condition but the history that we are preserving is worth it. I also want to thank all of you for the confidence in our leadership team that works tirelessly day in and day out.

Historical Matters: A Parisian prince of Poland who'd never been there, but lived in Burlingame instead

by Michael Svanevik and Shirley Burgett as published on Dec. 12, 2016 at mercurynews.com

LEFT: "Ski Farm," in the hills above Burlingame, was presented as a wedding gift to Andre and Elizabeth Poniatowski. Subsequent owners renamed it "Sky Farm." It is currently the site of Nueva School. RIGHT: Prince Andre Poniatowski's royal pedigree may have been questioned, but he was among the most popular residents of Burlingame during the 1890s. (Photos courtesy of MS&SB Collection)

Although his royal pedigree may have been less than impeccable, Andre Louis Leopold Charles Marie Poniatowski may well have been the closest thing that the Peninsula ever had to a prince of the blood.

Tall, handsome and apparently French, he first appeared in San Francisco in 1890. Moreover, and perhaps more importantly, Poniatowski was a bachelor.

According to his story that he delighted in telling, his great grand uncle Stanislaus Poniatowski, for three decades in the 18th century, had been the King of Poland, indeed, the last. Actually, the lineage of Stanislaus cast shadows on Andre's royal legitimacy.

Grand Duchess Catherine of Russia, soon to be the empress and remembered historically as Catherine the Great, had become enthralled with a 23-year-old, apparently viral Polish nobleman. She soon elevated him, making Stanislaus her very personal counselor. But, in 1765, in gratitude for long excellent service, she gave him a crown and shipped him off to Warsaw to rule as King of Poland.

As for Prince Andre, he had grown up in Paris and had never seen Poland. But there were other royal credentials. His uncle, Count Walewski, also a Parisian, was the illegitimate son of Emperor Napoleon I.

A few skeptical San Francisco families looked askance at the young man, some even suggesting that he may have been just another of many down-and-out European noblemen who came to California trolling for wealthy wives.

Still, San Francisco's wannabe society readily welcomed him. Especially Austin Sperry, founder of Sperry Mills in Stockton and the father of two attractive daughters. The eldest, Ethel, had wed banker William H. Crocker, third son of the transcontinental railroad builder, in 1886. Now the family sought an equally good match for Ethel's younger sister, Elizabeth, and Prince Poniatowski appeared to be the perfect candidate.

The marriage contract consummated, accompanied by Will and Ethel, the Sperrys headed for Paris. Prince Andre and Elizabeth were married in the Catholic Church of St. Pierre de Charillot, on Oct. 5, 1894.

Malicious gossip that had swirled about before the nuptials was soon forgotten, especially in status-conscious Burlingame, where the couple declared their intent to reside. As a wedding present, Will and Ethel Crocker presented the couple with several hundred acres and a wood-framed residence on the hill above the town where, using the last syllable of the family name of which the prince was so inordinately proud, the couple christened the house Ski Farm. In later years, after the family had gone to reside in France, a later owner of the property renamed it Sky Farm.

Prince Andre dressed impeccably, had a keen intelligence and spoke English perfectly, albeit with a delightful French accent. Thoroughly at home in Burlingame, always aristocratic and athletic, the prince became a “gentleman rider” and engaged in raising thoroughbred horses.

Poniatowski fashioned himself as a “promoter of enterprises.” Before long, in partnership with his banker brother-in-law Will Crocker, who provided financial backing, in Amador County, Poniatowski built the Blue Lake Powerhouse, designed to supply hydroelectricity to the Mother Lode. After that, Crocker and the prince built the Electra Powerhouse on the Mokelumne River, maneuvering to create an electricity monopoly along the San Francisco Peninsula. After a complicated series of acquisitions and mergers, in 1905, this operation developed into the Pacific Gas and Electric Co. While hydroelectricity may have been the source of a new fortune, Poniatowski’s passion was for fast horses. As a promoter of enterprises, when San Francisco was about to outlaw horse racing within the city limits and threatened to close Ingleside race course, one of Will Crocker’s major investments, the brothers-in-law seized opportunity. Crocker designated 200 unused acres already owned by the family in San Bruno, 13 miles south of the city. for the creation of a new racing enterprise.

This became Tanforan race track. Speed was of the utmost import. Crocker and Poniatowski, determined that it be in operation by the opening of racing season of 1899. Thus, they opted to utilize the identical architectural drawings that had been used in the creation of Ingleside. Prince Andre sent personal invitations only to the most fashionable families of the Peninsula upon the track’s opening. It was characterized by sweeping lawns, flower gardens and elegant shrubberies imported from France. Horse racing, previously regarded with some suspicion, now became appreciated as a genteel sport on the Peninsula, and going to Tanforan became the social thing to do.

Andre and Elizabeth Poniatowski became parents of three boys while living at Ski Farm. But in 1903, to the sadness of many fashionable friends at the Burlingame Country Club, the family packed up and headed for Paris. The prince had accepted a position as president of the French Bank of America. Only on rare occasions thereafter did they return to California. Elizabeth, commonly known in France as the Princess Poniatowska, passed away in 1943 at the age of 71. The storybook prince lived until age 90. He died in 1954 while visiting his chateau in Southern France.

Since we don't have a copy of that first issue and the Sacramento Union didn't mention the first issue until January 26, 1854, the date is uncertain. Nonetheless, the Dec. 11, 1854 Union announced Vol. II No. 1 of the Sentinel was in print and its name henceforth would be the Amador Sentinel, celebrating in masthead the final triumph of north Mokelumne forces to free themselves from south-river hegemony.

On Dec. 24, 1859, the Ledger reported the Sentinel's O.D. Availing had sold to the Ledger. Curiously, Avaline went to Folsom, bought out William Penry's interest in the Telegraph, and died not long after. But Penry came to Jackson after the great fire and was proprietor of the Dispatch until his death last century.

Thus, in 1859, you have the Ledger, born in 1855, buying out the Sentinel, born in 1853. Had Springer named the combined paper Amador Ledger and Sentinel would he era the right to assume the earlier date of nativity?

If so, the Ledger-Sentinel-Record, began its collective life in December, 1853. Hence, this paper you're reading could trace its genesis back 148 years. Let's hope the absentee owners, with resident publisher, editor and staff, can keep it alive and shoot for 200. Even in this digital age, there's nothing like a local newspaper. Amen.....
